

The Anchor

Your Future Maker type

WHO YOU ARE

Everyone leans on her, and she's built a life around holding it together. She needs to learn she's allowed to lean on someone too, even though nobody's ever really shown her how.

YOUR PAIN POINTS

- Her identity has quietly become “the one who's needed,” which makes it terrifying to imagine being anything else.
- Fears she'd be a burden if she ever actually asked for help, so she simply doesn't ask.
- One-way support builds a quiet resentment she rarely admits to, even to herself.
- Doesn't actually know how to receive help gracefully, because she's never had the practice.

TIPS AND TRICKS FOR YOU

- Practice saying “actually, I need help with this” out loud, to one person, once this week.
- Notice the discomfort the moment someone helps you, and let it happen anyway instead of deflecting it.
- Find a fear buddy whose actual job is to check in on you, not the other way around.
- Write down what you'd tell a friend who never let anyone help her. Then take your own advice.

growingwomeninbusiness.com
@growingwomeninbusiness