

The Wildflower

Your Future Maker type

WHO YOU ARE

She grew in ground nobody would've chosen for her, and did it anyway. Not the tidy row, not the greenhouse, just whatever soil she landed in. She's still growing quietly, whether anyone's watching or not, and she's never once needed an audience to keep going.

YOUR PAIN POINTS

- She's built real resilience but doesn't count it as a skill, just as "getting on with it."
- Quietly compares her own tangled, hard-won growth to women who look like they had it easier.
- Worries that if she stands out, she'll get uprooted again, so she stays small on purpose.
- Rarely gets told she's impressive, because nobody saw the ground she actually grew in.

TIPS AND TRICKS FOR YOU

- Write down, in plain words, the actual conditions you grew in. Read it back like it belongs to someone else. That's the skill you keep discounting.
- Practice being seen in small doses: one post, one comment, one moment a week where you let something show instead of growing quietly in the corner.
- Find one person and deliberately let them watch you grow, on purpose. Not everyone. Just one.
- Stop measuring your soil against someone else's. Nobody else grew where you grew.